Calcium channel blockers (CCBs) are the most commonly prescribed drugs to treat heart failure (HF), with a multitude of mechanisms contributing to their cardioprotective effect. Calcium influx through the L-type Ca^{2+} channel (LTCC) has been identified as a major stimulus for myocardial hypertrophy and HF. Pertussis toxin (PTX) is a potent inhibitor of $\text{G}\alpha\text{q}/\text{G}\alpha\text{i}$ signaling, including that of the LTCC. Interestingly, angiotensin II (Ang II) is known to promote Ca^{2+} entry via the Ang II type 1 receptor (AT1R) through PTX-sensitive $\text{G}\alpha\text{q}/\text{G}\alpha\text{i}$ signaling. However, the effects of CCBs on Ang II-induced Ca^{2+} signaling have not been studied in cardiac myocytes. Here, we hypothesized that PTX inhibits Ang II signaling in cardiac myocytes. The effect of PTX pretreatment on Ang II-stimulated Ca^{2+} transients in adult ventricular myocytes was examined using a dual Ca^{2+} /cell membrane permeability assay. The effect of PTX on Ang II-induced protein expression of phospho-protein kinase C (PKC) was also determined. Pretreatment of cardiac myocytes with PTX inhibited Ang II-stimulated increases in intracellular Ca^{2+} and cell shortening, as well as increases in protein expression of phospho-PKC. Furthermore, downregulation of phospho-PKC by selective overexpression of PKC inhibitory peptide attenuated the inhibitory effect of PTX on Ang II-induced cellular Ca^{2+} handling and shortening. These data indicate that PTX inhibits Ca^{2+} entry through Ang II-stimulated LTCC via $\text{G}\alpha\text{q}/\text{G}\alpha\text{i}$ signaling in adult cardiac myocytes. These results may provide novel insights regarding the potential therapeutic utility of CCBs in HF.

- Hey, Jeff. - Oh! - Hi, guys. - Ready for the grocery store? - We're going to go to Publix. We're gonna go to Ed's with Craig who I've never met and this is his first time on G-Money. We're gonna see, we're gonna have two questions. All right, let's do it. - Ed. - Ed, tell us a little bit about yourself and how you got into investing in the first place.

What's New In Adobe Photoshop CC 2015?

PLC3 phosphorylation at Ser376 is involved in its stabilization in response to N-cadherin activation. PLC3 has been shown to be a new substrate for protein kinase C (PKC) in HT29 cells. We show that the phosphorylation of PLC3 at serine (Ser) 376 by PKC is associated with the localization of PLC3 to the inner side of cell membrane, where it is activated by N-cadherin. In stably transfected HT29 cells overexpressing PLC3 (L-PLC3/HT29), coimmunoprecipitation studies show that the PLC3/N-cadherin complex is enriched with PLC3-Ser376 phosphorylation. In cells that express low levels of PLC3, such as Caco2 and AR42J cells, PLC3 is recruited into membrane sites in response to calcium (Ca^{2+}) and N-cadherin. A coimmunoprecipitation study also shows that Ca^{2+} and N-cadherin induce PLC3-Ser376 phosphorylation. In PLC3/HT29 cells, both in vitro kinase assay and the coimmunoprecipitation study show that PLC3 is phosphorylated on Ser376 by PKC activity. On the other hand, Ca^{2+} -dependent, diacylglycerol-independent PKC does not phosphorylate PLC3. Furthermore, mutation of Ser376 to Ala in the human PLC3c or PLC3d isoform prevents the Ca^{2+} - and N-cadherin-induced PLC3-Ser376 phosphorylation and localization of PLC3 to membrane sites. These data suggest that PLC3-Ser376 phosphorylation is involved in the interaction with N-cadherin, resulting in the localization of PLC3 to the inner membrane sites of HT29 cells.
